Labels can confuse you

By SHIRLEY W. WALTON
Extension Agent

A chewing gum is labeled "sugarless." A cereal claims that it is "made only from natural ingredients," and a margarine says it's "rich in unsaturated fat."

These and other terms used to describe food can be confusing. The following information may help you understand some of the label information.

Sugar content of foods is a growing concern of many shoppers. But just because a food is labeled "sugar-free" may not mean that all types of sugar are absent. The word sugar, according to the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) standards, means sucrose which is common table sugar. Fructose, dextrose, and maltose, however, are also sugars. The sugar alcohols-xylitol, sorbitol, and mannitol-are other nutritive sweeteners. If you want to cut down on more than sucrose, check the label for these sugars as well as honey, molasses, and corn syrup.

If you're scanning supermarket shelves for "low-sodium" foods, label reading may present some problems. There are currently no regulations that define this term. Usually the term implies that no salt (sodium chloride) has been added to the food. It doesn't mean, however, that other substances that contain sodium are absent. FDA plans to issue regualtions as part of an overall food labeling plan to define this term.

Advertising claims for "natural," "organic," or "health" foods may change if current Federal Trade Commission proposals become law. The term "natural" would only be allowed if the food or any of its ingredients are not more than minimally processed to make it safe and are free of artificial flavorings, color additives, and chemical preservatives. The term "organic" could only be used to describe food products grown with organic fertilizers and minerals and without direct application of synthetic fertilizers. The term "health food" would no longer be permitted in advertising.

Research relating fat and cholesterol content of foods with heart disease prompted the use of several terms on food labels. "Hydrogenated" and "partially hydrogenated" describe the chemical process of adding hydrogen to an unsaturated fat of oil to make it more solid (saturated). A recent FDA regulation requires the use of the term "hydrogenated" rather than "saturated" in labeling fats and oils.

In general polyunsaturated fats tend to be of vegetable origin and saturated fats of animal origin. Safflower, corn, cottonseed, and soybean oil are all high in polyunsaturated fats. Coconut oil, however, is one of the most saturated fats on the market. It is believed that polyunsaturated fats play a role in decreasing serum cholesterol levels. A margarine made from partially hydrogenated corn oil has lost some or all of the cholesterol-lowering effect of the original corn oil.

A 1978 regulation requires that the fat or oil in a food be specified on the label. For example, "cottonseed oil," "corn oil," "soybean oil," or "beef fat" would appear in the list of ingredients. This regulation also allows manufacturers to list more than one fat or oil on the label, any of which may be used in the product.

To help reduce confusion, FDA hopes to require that food labels contain information that consumers want and that they state information in a way consumers can understand. Consumers comments were obtained during a series of nationwide public hearings held last year. Once these comments are evaluated, FDA will develop a plan and again request consumer input.

If you have a homemaking problem or question, you may call 352-8244 or write P. O. Box 665, Appomattox, VA 24522. It is always a pleasure to hear from you and to help you.

Have a good week!
